HUMAN TRAFFICKING

Human trafficking is a global problem affecting millions of people each year who are illegally forced into forced labor and sexual exploitation through force, fraud, or coercion. The U.S. Department of Homeland Security estimates that human trafficking is second only to drug trafficking as the most profitable forms of transnational crime, generating billions of dollars a year in illicit profits. All victims of trafficking share one essential experience: the loss of freedom.

Businesses today are increasingly global, meaning that it is no longer a matter of if a business will come into contact with human trafficking but when. So it is important to be prepared. Working together, businesses can drive on the following best practices to identify signs of human trafficking and put steps in place to stop it.

It's not just good business practice, but it's the right thing to do.

SEX TRAFFICKING OF A MINOR

She was 15 when she met her trafficker. A cute, attentive, older guy contacted her on social media and suddenly hanging out with her friends was not as fun. He bought her gifts and said he loved her. But one day he said he needed help so he asked her to have sex with a man for money. So she did. But it wasn't just once, and if she refused he would hurt her. She's so confused – he's so different now. She wants to get out, but doesn't know how.

INDICATORS*

- Apparent minor involved in commercial sex
- Under the influence of drugs or alcohol
- Tattoos or brands indicating "ownership"
- Overly controlling "boyfriend" or older female
- Facial/body language display anxiety
- Child is preoccupied with "getting money"
- Child lies about age or identity
- Dresses inconsistent with true age

*While no single indicator confirms the existence of child sex trafficking, several indicators combined can increase the likelihood that a child is being exploited.
